

The average salary increases with experience level. Entry-level employees earn the lowest salaries, while executive-level professionals receive the highest compensation. This indicates a strong positive relationship between experience and salary in the data science job market.

The results show that salaries for Data Analysts in the United States increase with experience level. Executive and senior professionals earn the highest salaries, while entry-level employees receive the lowest compensation. The analysis also indicates that the United States represents the main location for Data Analyst positions.

The dashboard highlights important trends in the data science job market. Full-time employment is the most common job type, while medium and senior experience levels represent the largest share of professionals. The analysis also shows that larger companies employ more data professionals and that average salaries have increased steadily between 2020 and 2022. These findings indicate the growing demand for data science skills worldwide.